

THE POKÉDEX

FOR THE POKÉ RPG

The Pokédex

Hundreds of creatures with strange abilities, unique behaviors, and incredible powers inhabit the world. Many of these Pokémon have rarely been seen, others are part of everyday life. Many experts, scientists, breeders, and professors have dedicated their lives to collecting data of each Pokémon and compiling it into the Pokédex.

Reading the Pokédex

Each Pokémon has a long list of important game data, statistics, traits, and moves that are required for playing the Poké RPG. In the Pokédex you will find everything you need to create starters, wild encounters, or the skilled Pokémon of other trainers or villains.

Pokédex Entries

Each Pokédex entry includes the same basic but necessary information for every Pokémon. Some of this information is exceptionally relevant to combat and game mechanics.

- Type details what moves the Pokémon will gain STAB with, type effectiveness when being hit, and a few other benefits or drawbacks.
- Abilities explain which abilities from the Moves and Abilities chapter the Pokémon can obtain. Each Pokémon starts with 1 (usually random) ability but can learn another through training.
- BSTs are how the combat STATs are calculated for battle. To calculate most STATs you take the BST and multiply it by the combat level of the Pokémon and then add 10. For HP, you multiply the HP BST times the combat level times 3 ($HPBST \times LVL \times 3$) and then add 10.
- Move Speeds are how many squares a particular Pokémon moves using different forms of locomotion after spending its Move Action.
- The listed value is the base movement speed. Add half of the Pokémon's SPD BST (rounded down) to all movement speeds.
- If a Pokémon has a swim or climb speed they do not have to make Athletics checks to swim or climb (respectively) except under exceptional circumstances or extreme duress.
- Attributes for Pokémon include Intelligence (INT) and Strength (STR). These attributes relate directly to the Trainer attributes of the same name.
- Skills detail how much of a bonus, if any, a particular species of Pokémon gets to each skill. These bonuses are already listed as the final sum (no need to add or subtract INT or STR).
- Features are Innate Features as detailed in the Moves and Abilities chapter of the core rulebook.
- Evolution is how the Pokémon initiates evolution. Usually this is sometime after attaining certain level but sometimes it is exposure to certain stones, locations, or other Pokémon.

The Pokédex is both an in-game item (See the Pokédex Bearer trait) and this PDF, necessary for creating Pokémon to battle, capture, or defeat.

- In general, a Pokémon will not evolve immediately upon gaining the level listed in its Evolution section. Instead, sometime during that level while in a battle, chase or in response to an emotional or stressful event the Pokémon will evolve.

- Level Moves are new moves that a Pokémon can learn through level progression. Pokémon can master up to 4 moves at a time by default, but this number can be increased through training.
- Tutor Moves are moves that can be taught to a Pokémon through application of the Training skill by someone with the Move tutor trait.
- Egg moves are moves that can be learned by a Pokémon upon birth through application of the Breeding Skill.
- TM Moves are moves that can be learned with Technical Machines through the application of the Science skill.

Type Considerations

Pokémon that belong to a certain type have a number of benefits and drawbacks associated with their type.

Water-type's and Land

Water-type Pokémon are often fish, cnidarians (jellyfish), or cephalopods (squid and octopi). These animals in the real world cannot survive or move (for long) outside of water. In the Pokémon video games, no restriction is made on where these Pokémon can function. In the anime and manga, there are sometimes special considerations made, and sometimes not. Two potential methods for handling this are presented here.

First, you can ignore the physiology of these Pokémon or assume they have lungs and can survive out of water. It also helps to assume these Pokémon float while on land, basically functioning as if they had the Levitator innate feature (they cannot fly, but hover a few feet off the ground). If you like this option, give all Pokémon without land speeds a land speed equal to half their Swim speeds and describe them as floating in air as if they were still swimming (using their tails or fins to propel themselves around).

The second option is to impose a semblance of real-world physics into the game, and say that Water-type Pokémon based on fish or animals without lungs cannot survive on land. While on land they can “hold their breath” and function as if they were an air-breathing creature suffocating under water (see suffocation rules). In this method, allowing Water-type Pokémon without land speeds to jump up to half their Swim speeds out of water as part of any melee attack (and then jumping back into water as part of the same attack) can help alleviate some of the issues here. It is also recommended that a PM include water terrain features such as streams, lakes, fountains, or other bodies of water often if their players have such Water-type Pokémon.

Difficult Terrain

In general, Pokémon can ignore the increased movement speed costs associated with difficult terrain imposed by environments related to their type. Grass-type Pokémon, for example, can ignore difficult terrain of dense foliage, vines, or other plant-based impositions.

Fears and Behaviors

Some Pokémon types are exceptionally weak to others, and the Pokémon know it. Fire-type Pokémon, for example, are afraid of water, whether it be travel on a boat, flash floods, or Water-type attacks. Even Rain makes Fire-types miserable, and they are even more apprehensive of these situations than others. Pokémon should be anxious about engaging in any activity that might put them into direct contact or confrontation with elements or effects that are super-effective against their type. These fears can be overcome, like all fears, but it should be considered at all times.

On the other hand, Pokémon love to participate in anything that involves their type, Water-types love the rain. Fire-types sleep as near as possible to the campfire (or even in it). Grass-types love the dirt, sun, and water in equal measure.

Other Considerations

There are unique aspects of every Pokémon. Bulbasaur has extendable vines. Charmander can burn things as he walks. Squirtle's shell is hard and slick. These characteristics might not have any bearing on a particular scene, or they might be the solution to the current crisis facing the players. Whatever the case, Trainers and Pokémasters should keep these realities in mind and come to an agreeable mechanic as necessary.
